China will upgrade its main health and food safety administration, setting higher standards for food and medicine regulation.

The State Council, China’s top administrative body, said Monday it will establish a new agency to manage drug safety.

In the past decade, "progress has been made, but the current drug supervision system is far from satisfactory," the State Council said in a statement.

"We have to establish a new team to manage drug safety," the council said.

"The country needs a stronger body for drug safety supervision," the council said.

The new agency will be set up under the Chinese Academy of Medical Sciences, a leading medical research institute.

The agency will be responsible for managing drug safety and ensuring the quality of drug products.

The council said the new agency will also be responsible for regulating drug research and development.
